After 20 years in the U.S. Army, I was ready to find a career where I could utilize the skills that I acquired in the military in a rewarding way. In the Army, I held the position of Basic Leadership instructor, and worked tirelessly to train countless young leaders to evolve both their management and team building skills.

So, naturally, when it came time to embark on my next professional journey, I decided to pursue a career with the U.S. Department of State in the Civil Service.

In my short time with the Department, I've managed to complete the Office Support Professional's Program and begin a successful and fulfilling career as a Training Technician. In my new position, I get to exercise my analytical, business and management skills while supporting the business of diplomacy.

I've always been a firm believer of leading by example and setting a positive example. A Civil Service career with the U.S. Department of State allows me to do both, while effectively demonstrating that through hard work and dedication, anything is possible.
