When we think about the people who have transformed the world, we find that they have one thing in common. They serve as an inspiration for future generations. The fire of their days is put forward to better the society. That's something I'd like to be. An inspiration for others.

I'm not social, but I can lend a hand and an ear when needed. I think it makes some people trust me more.

I can write and spread hope for others. Share my views. Learn about cultures. I can study at summer schools practical skills needed to succeed as a web designer or a computer programmer. I can find my way around, and not blame the circumstances.

Later, when I find my girl, I can show her and my kids my more approachable side. I can stay curious, hopeful and forgiving. Inspire them to strive forward, and not become jaded along the way.

When I get my business going, I can employ a person similar to that one friend who decided to leave his birthplace and go to Germany in hope of finding a job. I can help one person I care about on this world.

I can blog about technology and topics that people might find useful.

I don't need to be a special person to repay my parents and future generations. This is my land. I can hope that my impact will be large enough to lend me a good life.

People seek moments that stop the decay time does to us all. Maybe, if I can help a person forget it, at least for a moment, this world will be easier to bear, at least for that moment.

I can offer a perspective.
